

El Lissitzky's Had Gadya, 1919

by Victor Margolin

Few works of graphic art have been the object of so much commentary as Lissitzky's Had Gadya. His ten splendid lithographs of the seder song tell the story of a series of assailants who consume each other until the final one, the Angel of Death, is destroyed by God. Jewish Lissitzky scholars tend to see in this story a parable of the Russian revolution. Both Alan Birnholz in his PhD dissertation of 1973 and Ruth Apter-Gabriel, in an essay published in 1987, take this position. Apter-Gabriel believes that Lissitzky substituted the redemptive power of the Communist Revolution for the power of God as it is described in the story.

When I was writing a chapter on Lissitzky's early work for a book on the avant-garde, I had difficulty with the assertions of my predecessors that Lissitzky unequivocally supported the revolution. A simple look at the historical facts shows Lenin's intention to reduce or eradicate the identities of the nationalities and his creation of a Jewish Bolshevik organization the Evseksiya that was charged with eliminating the Yiddish cultural milieu of which Lissitzky was an active participant. What further dissuaded me was the ambiguity of Lissitzky's statements about his non-objective Prouns paintings. If he were supportive of the revolution and had created Had Gadya to express that position, why would he not be more clear about the meaning of his paintings, which he began the same year? I concluded that Lissitzky's reluctance to define the Prouns as political parables was due to his ambivalence about the revolution. He was caught between the affirmation of a new secular Yiddish culture and the Bolshevik government's attempt to eradicate it. My interpretation is based on the argument that not all members of the avant-garde had the same stake in the revolution and therefore not all shared a common belief in its value.

Copyright © 2000 Victor Margolin. All rights reserved.
Commentary on El Lissitzky, "Had Gadya Suite, 1919" in Major Intersections (New York: Yeshiva University, 2000).